Pros and cons of Living in a City

Living in an urban center can be great if you enjoy the hustle and bustle and want to be close to the action and new possibilities. There are many reasons to choose a place to live. Cost, weather, demographics, crime, recent growth, school performance, and proximity to work may affect your choice on which neighborhood is best for you.

Here are some financial, cultural and lifestyle benefits of living in any Big City.

Public Transportation & Walkability. Access can be considered the main perk of living in an urban center, Attractions & Entertainment. Restaurants & Shopping. Social Possibilities & Networking,

Medical Care & Service for Seniors etc. While there are several benefits of living in an urban center, some challenges exist as well. Cost of living, noise and lack of space cause many to live on the outskirts and commute to work or even search for the rural life. Be prepared to make the most of small space and pay for increased access if you are moving into the city. It's important to weigh the pros and cons specific to your situation before making the choice of where to live. For some the benefits of living in the city will be enough of a lure but for others, a turn-off. Generally speaking, the closer your proximity to metropolitan areas, the more expensive living will be. A three bedroom home in the countryside may cost the same as a small, one bedroom apartment in the city. Living in an urban setting also comes with higher overall costs where everything from food to fuel is more expensive. If you're just starting out and on a limited budget, living in the city can be difficult from a financial perspective. With metropolitan areas being the central hub of commerce, they tend to have considerably more job opportunities than places with a smaller population density. You also don't have to deal with the pain of commuting like you would when living in an outlying area and still working in the city. If you have a family or are planning on starting one in the future, a rural area can be advantageous because larger homes that are capable of housing multiple people are more affordable than in the city. Industrialization and deforestation are two things that go along with building the infrastructure of a big city. An unfortunate byproduct of this is increased pollution, which can diminish air quality and throw the environmental equilibrium. If this is an issue, then an urban setting probably won't be to your liking. Living in a rural setting means closer access to Nature, which is a big plus for good living. Otherwise, urban living can be a fine option. If you work in the city, you can look forward to getting away from it all every night. Watch the big city get smaller as you head for the hills. What's not to love? Imagine waking up to the sound of birds cooing, as opposed to traffic rumbling. Bliss. Whether you find life in the suburbs or the city more appealing depends largely on your own circumstances. Young professionals with busy work or social lives often prefer the advantages of living in the city, particularly the convenience and nightlife. Life in the rural area is more popular among families looking to settle down, to them who are drawn to the relaxed lifestyle and more spacious and affordable lifestyle. Whatever may be your preference, the living in location of your choice means you're sure to find the living fit for your taste, needs and circumstances

Thanks and Regards
